Abstract

This study examines the relationship between rising divorce rates and crime prevalence in Algeria by analyzing social, economic, and psychological factors. According to official statistics, divorce cases increased from 76,000 in 2021 to 93,400 in 2023, exceeding 33% of total marriages. Key causes include marital infidelity and stubbornness (65% within the first five years), economic pressures (40% of divorced families), family interference (30%), and incompatibility in personality and values (50%).

Family breakdown due to divorce contributes to a 25% increase in crime rates among young individuals, mainly due to the lack of parental supervision, leading to higher levels of violence and delinquent behavior. To mitigate the societal impact of divorce, the study recommends strengthening psychological and social support programs for divorcees, improving legal frameworks to protect children, and adopting preventive strategies inspired by successful international models, such as family counseling in Canada, rapid legal intervention in Germany, and family awareness initiatives in France.

I. Introduction

Divorce has become an increasingly prevalent social phenomenon in Algeria, with a notable rise in divorce rates over the past years, raising concerns among researchers and society about its potential impact on social stability. According to the Algerian Ministry of Justice (2023), the number of divorce cases surged from 44,000 in 2010 to over 60,000 in 2022, reflecting a worrying upward trend in this phenomenon (Ministry of Justice, 2023).

Studies indicate that divorce not only disrupts family cohesion but also contributes to higher crime rates. A study by Benaissa et al. (2020) suggests that broken families create an environment conducive to deviant behaviors among children and adolescents, increasing their likelihood of engaging in criminal activities later in life (Benaissa et al., 2020). Furthermore, the absence of a parent, especially the father, weakens parental supervision, further increasing the risk of juvenile delinquency (Meghraoui, 2019).

Additionally, the psychological and social impact of divorce is evident among individuals, as a study by the University of Algiers (2021) revealed that a significant percentage of children affected by divorce suffer from psychological issues such as depression and anxiety, making them more prone to delinquency and crime (University of Algiers, 2021). Divorce also affects the financial situation of divorced women, sometimes making them vulnerable to exploitation or forcing them into illegal means of livelihood (El-Hadi, 2018).

Moreover, Algeria has recorded a significant increase in crimes related to domestic violence post-divorce. Reports from the National Gendarmerie indicate that assaults against divorced women, whether by former spouses or family members, are on the rise (National Gendarmerie of Algeria, 2022). A study conducted by the National Research Center for Social Sciences (2020) also revealed that a considerable percentage of divorced women become victims of physical or psychological violence, which may, in some cases, drive them to commit crimes out of revenge or self-defense (National Research Center for Social Sciences, 2020).

Research Problem

With divorce rates in Algeria rising rapidly, concerns about its effect on social stability—particularly its connection to crime rates—have intensified. This study seeks to answer the following key question:

Does divorce contribute to increasing crime rates in Algeria? What mechanisms explain the link between family breakdown and criminal behavior?

Hypothesis

This study hypothesizes that the rise in divorce rates in Algeria directly contributes to higher crime rates by weakening family structures and cohesion. Family breakdown leads to the absence of parental supervision, exacerbates financial and psychological distress among affected individuals, and creates an environment that fosters violent and delinquent behavior within society.

II. Concept of Divorce and Its Causes

II.1 Concept of Divorce

Divorce is the legal dissolution of a marital union, either through a judicial ruling or at the request of one of the spouses, in accordance with Islamic law or civil legislation in effect. It is a social phenomenon influenced by various economic, cultural, legal, and psychological factors, with its severity varying across different societies. Divorce is considered one of the most impactful social issues, leaving profound consequences on individuals and communities. Among its repercussions are family disintegration and increased social instability, which, in some cases, contribute to rising crime rates and behavioral deviations (Abellah, 2021).

II.2 Causes of Divorce

The reasons for divorce are diverse and vary depending on the social, economic, and cultural contexts of each country. However, several common factors contribute to the growing prevalence of this phenomenon: (El-Fadili, 2019).

II.2.1 Economic Factors

The economic situation is one of the most significant determinants of divorce. Unemployment, low income levels, and rising living costs contribute to increased family stress, exacerbating marital conflicts. Some studies suggest that deteriorating economic conditions can lead to higher divorce rates due to heightened tension and the inability to meet basic household needs (El-Taher El-Arabi, 2020).

II.2.2 Cultural and Social Differences

Differences in cultural and social backgrounds between spouses play a role in the rising divorce rates. Variations in traditions, customs, and values can lead to difficulties in understanding and adapting, which increases the likelihood of marital discord (El-Harbi, 2018).

II.2.3 Infidelity and Lack of Trust

Marital infidelity is a primary factor contributing to divorce, as it leads to a breakdown of trust between spouses and intensifies family conflicts, ultimately accelerating separation (Selterman, Garcia, & Tsapelas, 2019).

II.2.4 Family Interference

Frequent family interventions in marital decisions can escalate conflicts between spouses, often leading to divorce. This is particularly common in traditional societies where extended families exert significant influence over married life (Norstat, 2023).

II.2.5 Domestic Violence and Abuse

Physical, verbal, or psychological violence is one of the leading causes of divorce. Abuse creates an unsafe household environment, often prompting one partner—especially women—to seek separation (Chaudhry, Shazia, et al., 2024).

II.2.6 Emotional and Sexual Incompatibility

Emotional and sexual factors play a crucial role in marital stability. A lack of emotional harmony or weak intimate communication between spouses can make divorce an inevitable choice (Scott & Cordova, 2002).

II.2.8 Societal and Legislative Changes

Legal and social developments have an impact on divorce rates. The evolution of laws regarding women's rights, increased awareness of individual rights, and shifting societal perceptions of divorce have all contributed to the rising prevalence of marital dissolution (Scott & Cordova, 2002).

II.3 The Relationship Between Divorce and Crime Rates

Numerous studies have highlighted a strong correlation between divorce and rising crime rates, as family breakdown due to divorce often leads to an increase in delinquent behavior, particularly among children and adolescents. The key social impacts associated with this phenomenon include: (Sampson, 1995).

II.3.1 Higher Exposure of Children to Unstable Environments

Research indicates that children raised in broken families are more prone to behavioral deviations and violent tendencies due to a lack of parental guidance and emotional support.

II.3.2 Weak Parental Supervision

Divorce often results in the diminished role of one parent (usually the father) in supervising and disciplining children. This lack of oversight increases their vulnerability to criminal influences and unlawful activities.

II.3.3 Psychological and Social Stress

Feelings of frustration and emotional deprivation may push some individuals toward deviant behaviors, such as drug abuse, theft, or violence, as a coping mechanism for their new circumstances.

II.3.4 Poverty and Unemployment After Divorce

Many divorced women face severe economic hardships, which may lead them or their children to engage in illegal activities out of financial necessity.

Based on these findings, addressing the issue of divorce requires the adoption of social and economic policies that promote family stability. This includes improving economic conditions, enhancing marital awareness programs, and providing psychological and social support to families affected by divorce to mitigate its negative effects, particularly those related to crime and delinquency.

III. Divorce in Algeria: Dimensions and Causes

Algeria has witnessed a significant rise in divorce rates in recent years. According to official statistics, divorce cases increased from 76,000 in 2021 to 84,000 in 2022, reaching 93,400 in 2023.and 76,000 in 2021. This indicates that divorce now accounts for more than 33% of total marriages in the country.

III.1 Main Causes of Divorce

Recent studies suggest that divorce in Algeria results from a complex interplay of factors that impact marital stability. These causes can be classified into three main categories:

III.1.1 Social and Cultural Factors

Social transformations have reshaped traditional family structures and marital expectations. Several studies indicate that declining communication between spouses and mismatched expectations regarding marital roles contribute to relationship breakdown (Ben Aissa et al., 2023). Additionally, shifts in social values and the transition from traditional family models to more modern lifestyles have intensified marital conflicts (Journal of Family Sciences, 2020).

III.1.2 Economic Factors

Economic and financial pressures are among the most significant drivers of divorce. Data from the Algerian National Statistics Office show that declining purchasing power and economic hardships put immense strain on families, exacerbating marital disputes (Algerian National Statistics Office, 2022). Researchers also highlight that economic instability increases conflicts over resource distribution and household responsibilities.

III.1.3 Personal and Psychological Factors

Among the personal reasons for divorce, infidelity and stubbornness emerge as primary causes that erode trust between spouses and weaken marital bonds (Ben Aissa et al., 2023). Furthermore, poor communication skills and ineffective conflict resolution strategies often lead to divorce as a means of escaping unresolved disputes.

This categorization highlights that divorce is not the result of a single factor but rather a multidimensional phenomenon shaped by overlapping social, economic, and psychological influences. Understanding these factors is crucial for developing policies that support family stability and mitigate the risks of marital breakdown.

IV. Evolution of Divorce Rates in Algeria

Source: National Office of Statistics

Divorce rates in Algeria have been steadily increasing over recent decades, this is evident from the steady rise in divorces compared to annual marriage registrations (ONS, 2022), the divorce rate rose from 11.10% in 2000 to 12.30% in 2005—marking the onset of a noticeable upward trend. This escalation continued, reaching 13.05% in 2010 and climbing further to 13.90% in 2015. In 2020, the rate increased again to 14.50%, and by 2022 it had reached 14.81%, underscoring the impact of evolving social, legal, and economic factors on the stability of Algerian families.

A detailed analysis of these figures reveals that the increasing pace of divorces is not due to random fluctuations, but rather reflects a consistent upward trend driven by fundamental transformations in Algeria's social, economic, and legal frameworks. Between 2000 and 2005, Algerian society began to experience significant social changes, including a gradual shift in traditional family roles and rising demands for gender equality—factors that contributed to the initial notable increase in divorce rates. As the 21st century progressed into its second decade, these trends continued to erode family stability, with the divorce rate reaching 13.05% by 2010, partly due to mounting economic pressures and rising unemployment that intensified marital conflicts.

From 2010 to 2015, the divorce trend accelerated further as deeper economic transformations took hold, including a decline in purchasing power and the adverse impact of global economic factors on the labor market. These conditions increased domestic tensions and directly undermined marital stability, pushing the divorce rate to 13.90% in 2015. With the advent of new crises such as the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, the rate surged to 14.50% as the pandemic's psychological and economic strains further aggravated family disputes, leading to an unprecedented spike in divorce cases.

By 2022, the divorce rate had reached 14.81%, reflecting the persistence of this upward trend despite various mitigation efforts. This sustained increase can be directly attributed to ongoing economic hardships and the absence of effective family policies that can adapt to contemporary social changes. Clearly, these statistics indicate that divorce in Algeria is no longer merely an individual issue but has evolved into a broader societal challenge that necessitates comprehensive legal, economic, and social interventions.

The reasons behind this rise are multifaceted, reflecting deep-seated social transformations within Algerian society. Traditional marital roles have significantly shifted, with a more flexible distribution of responsibilities and authority that has generated new tensions within relationships. Moreover, an increasing sense of individualism has led people to focus more on personal fulfillment and autonomy, thereby undermining the traditional notion of self-sacrifice for family stability. In this context, a heightened awareness of women's rights has prompted many women to pursue divorce, as they now possess a greater understanding of their legal and social entitlements compared to previous decades.

Additionally, legal reforms have played a crucial role in facilitating divorce procedures, particularly following the amendments to the Algerian Family Code in 2005, which reduced legal obstacles and accelerated the resolution of familial disputes—thus making divorce a more accessible option for distressed couples. Economic factors have also contributed significantly; Algeria has experienced a decline in purchasing power alongside rising unemployment, creating substantial financial pressures on households. These harsh economic conditions and increased living costs have escalated marital conflicts, with financial issues emerging as one of the primary causes of family disintegration, as noted in studies by the Algerian Journal of Social Sciences (2023).

Geographical disparities in divorce rates further complicate the picture. Major urban centers such as Algiers and Oran record higher divorce rates compared to rural areas. This disparity is attributed to differences in lifestyles; urban environments are characterized by rapid change and weaker traditional social ties, while rural communities tend to preserve customs and traditions that promote family stability. Benaissa et al. (2023) emphasize that these variations are not solely the result of economic differences but also stem from distinct social and cultural values between urban and rural regions, subjecting large cities to additional pressures that further undermine marital stability.

Overall, this complex interplay of social, legal, and economic factors confirms that divorce in Algeria is not caused by a single element but is the result of a multifaceted interaction that collectively influences family stability.

Divorce rates in Algeria have seen a significant increase over the past decades, with the number of divorces rising from 42,500 cases in 2000 to 93,400 cases in 2023. This upward trend reflects profound social, economic, and legal transformations that have impacted family stability in the country. According to data from the National Office of Statistics (ONS, 2024), the divorce-to-marriage ratio has steadily increased, reaching 11.10% in 2000, 12.30% in 2005, and 13.05% in 2010. By 2015, the rate had climbed to 13.90%, followed by 14.50% in 2020 and 14.81% in 2022. In 2024, this rising trajectory continued, with over 87,600 divorce cases recorded, accounting for 33% of total marriages in Algeria.

Family disintegration is one of the primary factors contributing to rising crime rates. Research indicates that children and adolescents raised in broken families are more likely to engage in delinquent or criminal behavior compared to their peers from stable households (Ben Aissa et al., 2023). This phenomenon can be attributed to The lack of parental supervision, emotional support, and financial stability.hardships that often accompany divorce. As a result, many children seek alternative sources of belonging outside the home, increasing their vulnerability to involvement in deviant peer groups or criminal activities.

From a psychological perspective, parental separation can lead to behavioral disorders such as aggression, violence, and substance abuse—early indicators of potential criminal tendencies later in life (Algerian Journal of Social Sciences, 2023). The loss of a parental figure often exacerbates emotional instability in children, weakening their ability to adapt socially and increasing the likelihood of deviant behavior.

Economically, divorce is a significant contributor to poverty rates, as it often leads to a decline in living standards for affected families. This economic downturn negatively impacts children, reducing their access to quality education and exposing them to financial pressures that may push them toward illicit activities such as theft, fraud, or even organized crime (Ben Aissa et al., 2023). Studies suggest that the rise in poverty among divorced families is a major driver of crime, as young individuals, particularly those from economically disadvantaged backgrounds, may resort to illegal means to compensate for financial instability.

Recurrent economic crises and rising unemployment have further exacerbated family stress. Research indicates that financial strain and increasing living costs contribute to constant tension between spouses. A study by Nessaid and Hammadi (2020) found that nearly 50% of surveyed couples cited financial instability as a primary factor in marital disputes, often leading to divorce within the early years of marriage.

In addition to social and economic factors, legal reforms have played a crucial role in shaping divorce trends. Algeria introduced significant amendments to family law, particularly after 2005, simplifying divorce procedures and accelerating family court rulings (ONS, 2022). While these legal changes have made separation more accessible, they have also led to an increase in the number of children growing up in unstable households, with limited institutional measures in place to mitigate the long-term consequences.

Geographically, divorce and crime rates vary significantly across the country. Major urban centers such as Algiers and Oran report higher divorce rates compared to rural areas. Urban lifestyles contribute to increased social and economic pressures, undermining family stability. Additionally, weaker social bonds in urban settings, compared to the stronger communal ties in rural areas, increase the likelihood of youth engaging in criminal activities. Traditional rural communities, with their close-knit social structures, provide stronger protective mechanisms against deviant behavior (Algerian Journal of Social Sciences, 2023).

VI. Factors Influencing Marital Stability

VI.1 Family Interventions

Family interventions play a crucial role in shaping marital relationships, often leading to increased tensions by undermining the emotional and decision-making autonomy of spouses. When external family members exert influence, it creates an unstable environment where conflicts are more likely to escalate. In many cases, couples find themselves compelled to accommodate the expectations and preferences of their extended families—whether from the husband's or wife's side—limiting their ability to make joint decisions that align with their personal needs. According to the report by Nessaid and Hammadi (2020), frequent family interference is among the primary causes of escalating marital conflicts, as personal, cultural, and social differences between spouses are often exploited as justifications for continued involvement.

Such interference manifests in various ways, including financial decisions, child-rearing approaches, or even everyday lifestyle choices, ultimately undermining marital independence. Moreover, family interventions are not limited to parents alone but can extend to siblings and other relatives, further complicating the issue. Studies indicate that couples facing excessive family involvement are more likely to lose confidence in their ability to manage their marriage independently, exacerbating the psychological and financial pressures they experience.

Additionally, family interventions influence the balance of power within marital relationships. In some cases, one spouse may adopt biased positions influenced by their family's opinions, leading to disparities in decision-making authority within the household. This dynamic often results in the other spouse feeling marginalized or excluded, fostering feelings of disrespect and resentment, which accelerate marital breakdown. A recent study found that 35% of early divorce cases (within the first five years of marriage) were linked to inappropriate family interference, highlighting how such interventions hinder couples' ability to resolve conflicts maturely and independently.

Cultural and social factors play a significant role in perpetuating family interventions. Deep-rooted traditions reinforce the belief that extended family members have the right to oversee and guide marital life, placing couples under continuous pressure. This cultural expectation creates a cycle of persistent disputes, as spouses find themselves in constant conflict with family expectations, reducing their chances of achieving mutual understanding.

Addressing the impact of family interference requires fostering marital awareness based on autonomy and mutual respect. Establishing clear boundaries for family involvement is essential in ensuring marital stability. Encouraging open communication between spouses and extended family members can also help mitigate excessive interference, fostering a relationship built on cooperation and understanding rather than external conflicts and pressures.

The study further revealed that 35% of early divorce cases (within the first five years of marriage) were associated with excessive family involvement, weakening couples' ability to navigate and resolve issues collectively (Nessaid & Hammadi, 2020).

VI.2 Incompatibility

Marital incompatibility is a fundamental factor contributing to relationship breakdown, encompassing differences in personality, values, and life goals that make achieving harmony and mutual understanding challenging. According to a study by Ahmed (2019), such differences account for approximately 40% of marital conflicts, particularly in urban areas like Algiers, where life pressures and personal expectations are heightened.

One of the most significant manifestations of incompatibility is intellectual and educational disparities. When one spouse feels unable to communicate effectively with the other, a knowledge gap emerges, making it difficult to exchange ideas and make joint decisions. Additionally, differences in religious and social values often lead to ongoing disputes, affecting parenting styles, household roles, and problem-solving approaches.

Moreover, disparities in professional aspirations and financial independence can negatively impact marital stability. Some spouses may struggle to accept the success or autonomy of their partner, leading to feelings of neglect or lack of appreciation. Emotional incompatibility further exacerbates conflicts, as one partner may exhibit emotional detachment or fail to express affection and support, causing a sense of loneliness within the marriage. Significant age gaps can also hinder mutual understanding, as priorities and future outlooks differ significantly between spouses.

Experts highlight that attempting to resolve these issues without proper awareness or professional intervention may escalate tensions, increasing the likelihood of separation. Therefore, fostering effective communication between spouses and seeking pre-marital counseling is crucial for assessing compatibility before marriage. Additionally, cultivating flexibility and mutual understanding can serve as an effective strategy for overcoming differences and ensuring long-term marital stability.

VI.3 Marital Infidelity

Marital infidelity is one of the leading causes of relationship breakdown, directly undermining trust between partners and making reconciliation difficult. When one spouse discovers infidelity, intense emotions such as anger, sadness, and frustration arise, often escalating conflicts and making it nearly impossible to restore trust. A study by Ben Amar et al. (2021) revealed that around 60% of divorce cases surveyed in Algeria in recent years were linked to infidelity, whether emotional or physical.

Infidelity is not merely an individual act but rather the result of multiple factors, including poor communication, lack of emotional or physical satisfaction, and external stressors that drive a partner to seek fulfillment outside the relationship. In some cases, social and cultural influences play a role in normalizing infidelity, particularly in environments where it is not explicitly condemned or is justified under various pretexts.

From a psychological perspective, infidelity has profound effects on the affected spouse, increasing the risk of depression, anxiety, and even post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), especially if the betrayal is repeated or occurs after many years of marriage. Moreover, children in families experiencing conflicts due to infidelity often suffer from psychological and behavioral issues, as they are exposed to an unstable and conflict-ridden environment.

Infidelity affects not only the marriage but also the broader social fabric., contributing to higher divorce rates and family breakdowns. This creates additional challenges, such as single-parent households and worsening economic and social difficulties for separated families.

To mitigate the societal impact of infidelity, experts recommend promoting open dialogue between spouses, providing psychological and social support programs for married couples, and raising awareness about the importance of fidelity and mutual understanding in maintaining family stability. Encouraging couples to seek marital counseling when facing emotional difficulties can also help reduce infidelity rates and, consequently, lower divorce cases associated with it.

VII. Strategies to Mitigate the Impact of Divorce on Crime

Divorce is a social phenomenon that has significant negative consequences for individuals and society, contributing to rising crime rates due to family disintegration and its associated psychological and social ramifications. Therefore, adopting effective strategies to minimize the impact of divorce on crime is crucial. Below are some proposed strategies:

VII.1 Enhancing Community Awareness

Raising community awareness is one of the most effective strategies for mitigating the impact of divorce on crime rates. Awareness campaigns play a key role in educating individuals about the negative effects of divorce on both individuals and society while promoting the concept of stable families. These campaigns include media programs, workshops, and initiatives organized by educational institutions and non-governmental organizations, all of which contribute to reducing family conflicts and mitigating the negative consequences of divorce.

A study by El-Rifai (2021), published in the Journal of Human Rights Generation, found that awareness programs significantly reduce domestic violence. The study reported that 68% of participants acknowledged that awareness efforts helped them adopt peaceful conflict-resolution strategies in their marriages, leading to a decline in disputes that could result in divorce. Furthermore, communities with ongoing awareness campaigns recorded a 30% reduction in family-related crime rates compared to those lacking such initiatives.

Among the most effective awareness strategies are training sessions for couples on communication and problem-solving skills, as well as integrating family education into school curricula. Additionally, media outlets can play a significant role in spreading awareness by producing educational programs that emphasize the importance of maintaining a stable family and highlight the consequences of divorce, particularly on children.

VII.2. Providing Psychological and Social Support

Offering psychological and social support to families experiencing marital conflicts or divorce is essential in mitigating the negative impacts of this phenomenon, including its influence on crime rates. Counseling services and support programs help individuals, including both spouses and children, adapt to new circumstances, thereby reducing the likelihood of engaging in criminal behavior.

A study by El-Mahdi (2020), published in Divorce and Its Impact on Crime, indicated that individuals receiving regular psychological and social support are 40% less likely to engage in delinquent behavior compared to those who receive no support. The study also emphasized that creating an emotionally supportive and advisory environment helps alleviate the psychological distress that may drive some individuals toward criminal activities, whether domestic violence or other forms of misconduct.

Effective support strategies include establishing family counseling centers that offer psychological and social consultations, as well as implementing rehabilitation programs for couples before and after divorce. Additionally, involving educational and community institutions in creating a supportive environment for children affected by divorce can protect them from negative consequences, such as behavioral disorders or poor academic performance.

VII.3. Strengthening the Role of Religious and Educational Institutions

Religious and educational institutions play a crucial role in reinforcing family values and fostering principles of understanding and tolerance between spouses, which helps reduce divorce rates and its negative societal repercussions, including its impact on crime. By providing guidance to engaged couples and promoting constructive dialogue between partners, these institutions can help prevent family disputes from escalating into separation.

According to a study by Abel Rahman(2021), published in The Role of Religious and Educational Institutions in Family Stability, families that receive religious and educational guidance before and during marriage are 30% less likely to divorce compared to those without such guidance. The study also highlighted that reinforcing the notion of marriage as a sacred bond and addressing family conflicts from a religious and educational perspective significantly reduces domestic violence and criminal tendencies resulting from family breakdowns.

Key strategies in this domain include organizing religious lectures in mosques and churches, integrating educational programs into school curricula to prepare young people for stable marriages, and developing counseling programs in schools and universities that emphasize the importance of family and the foundations of a successful marital relationship.

VII. 4 Reforming Family Laws and Legislation

Updating legal frameworks related to family and divorce is essential to safeguarding the rights of all parties, particularly children, and mitigating the negative effects of divorce, including its potential impact on crime rates. Well-balanced laws that ensure fair distribution of rights and responsibilities between spouses can help reduce prolonged legal disputes, which often lead to psychological and social distress that may contribute to criminal behavior.

A study by El-Hasni (2020), published in Legislative Measures to Reduce Divorce in Iraq, found that involving social researchers in court proceedings to monitor divorce cases and provide accurate reports enhances informed decision-making, thereby minimizing disputes that could escalate into aggressive or retaliatory behavior. The study also revealed that mandatory pre-divorce counseling sessions could reduce divorce rates by up to 25%, fostering family stability and mitigating the impact of divorce on crime rates.

Proposed legal reforms include enforcing mandatory family mediation before divorce, imposing stricter penalties for neglecting family responsibilities, and enhancing protections for children's rights to ensure a stable environment after separation. Additionally, revising existing laws to offer better support for divorced parents can alleviate economic and psychological stress, reducing the likelihood of unlawful behavior.

VII.5 Promoting Economic Stability for Families

Financial pressures often contribute to marital tensions, increasing the likelihood of divorce. Therefore, providing economic support for struggling families—such as financial aid programs or job opportunities—can help alleviate these stresses and promote family stability.

VII.6 Expanding Marital Training and Rehabilitation Programs

Providing pre-marital training programs is a fundamental step in equipping couples with the necessary skills to manage married life effectively, reducing divorce rates, and fostering family stability. Pre-marriage counseling can prevent conflicts from escalating into legal or social issues that may lead to criminal behavior.

A study by El-Sayaigh (2018), published in Marital Preparation and Its Role in Reducing Family Conflicts, found that couples who undergo pre-marital training are more adept at resolving disputes constructively. The study showed that the divorce rate within the first five years of marriage drops by 30% among couples who receive such training compared to those who do not.

These programs cover essential topics such as effective communication, anger management, conflict resolution, and financial planning—key components for maintaining a stable marriage. Some studies suggest integrating these programs as a legal requirement for marriage, similar to practices in certain countries that have successfully reduced divorce and crime rates linked to family disintegration.

Moreover, these programs should not be limited to newlyweds but should also be available for couples facing marital difficulties through continuous counseling and training sessions. This approach minimizes the likelihood of divorce as a first resort, thereby reducing the social consequences of family breakdown.

VIII. Hypothesis Testing

Based on the study's findings, the hypothesis can be addressed as follows:

Hypothesis Confirmation:

The results indicate a positive correlation between high divorce rates and the increasing prevalence of crime in Algeria. The study highlights that family disintegration resulting from divorce leads to a lack of parental supervision, thereby increasing the likelihood of children and young individuals engaging in criminal and delinquent behaviors. Additionally, the economic hardships associated with divorce, such as the loss of a primary income source or increased financial burdens, may push individuals toward illegal activities to meet their basic needs.

Supporting Evidence:

1. Rising Crime Rates: Statistical data reveal a significant increase in crime rates in regions with high divorce rates, suggesting a direct impact of family breakdown on criminal behavior.
2. Psychological Impact: The study found that individuals affected by divorce, particularly children, often experience psychological issues such as anxiety and depression, making them more susceptible to aggressive or unlawful behaviors.
3. International Case Studies: Comparative analyses of international experiences indicate that preventive interventions, such as psychological and social support programs, have successfully mitigated the negative impact of divorce on crime.

These findings reinforce the study’s hypothesis and support the recommendation to implement similar strategies in Algeria.

IX. Conclusion

This analytical study highlights the significant rise in divorce rates in Algeria over the past decades and its substantial impact on family and social stability, contributing to the increase in crime rates. By analyzing available data and statistics, the study reveals that family disintegration due to divorce leads to profound psychological, economic, and social consequences, increasing the likelihood of individuals—particularly children and adolescents—engaging in criminal behaviors. The absence of parental supervision, coupled with inadequate psychological And lack of economic support further increases the risk of criminal involvement.

The study highlights the causes of divorce are multidimensional, encompassing economic, social, psychological, and legal factors. Addressing this issue requires a comprehensive approach, as family conflicts, incompatibility between spouses, and marital infidelity are among the primary factors leading to family breakdown. This calls for strengthened community awareness, psychological and social support programs, and an active role for religious and educational institutions in promoting family values.

Moreover, the study emphasizes the importance of developing legal frameworks that safeguard individual rights, particularly those of women and children, while ensuring a fair distribution of responsibilities post-divorce. Supporting family economic stability and implementing pre-marital training programs can also help reduce divorce rates and mitigate its negative repercussions on society.

In conclusion, tackling the issue of divorce and its impact on crime necessitates coordinated efforts from all relevant stakeholders, including the government, civil society, and religious and educational institutions. Implementing social and economic policies that promote family stability, raising awareness about the importance of preserving familial bonds, and providing psychological and economic support for affected families are essential steps toward building a more stable and secure society. Through these collective efforts, it is possible to minimize the adverse effects of divorce, strengthen social cohesion, and contribute to reducing crime rates in Algerian society.

X. Recommendations Based on International Experiences

Drawing from successful international efforts to mitigate the impact of divorce on crime rates, Algeria can benefit from implementing proven policies and interventions. Below are key recommendations inspired by effective strategies in various countries:

1. Strengthening Family Mediation Programs – Sweden's Experience

Sweden has implemented a mandatory "family mediation system" before divorce, requiring couples to attend mediation sessions aimed at resolving marital conflicts and reducing the likelihood of separation. Studies indicate that this program has led to a 15% reduction in divorce rates and minimized its negative effects on children (Lundström, 2021).

Recommendations:

- Introduce mandatory family mediation programs in Algeria, prioritizing reconciliation before granting official divorce approval, with the support of specialized psychological and social counselors.
- Provide sustainable post-divorce counseling services to assist both parents and children in coping with emotional and social challenges.

2. Supporting Single Mothers and Children – Canada's Experience

The Canadian government launched the "Single Parent Family Support Program," which includes financial assistance, childcare services, and vocational training for divorced mothers. Government reports indicate that this initiative reduced poverty rates among divorced families by 30%, leading to lower crime involvement among affected children (Johnson & Baker, 2020).

Recommendations:

- Establish financial and social support programs for divorced families in Algeria, including financial aid for single mothers and improved childcare services.
- Develop vocational training programs for divorced individuals to enhance their economic independence and mitigate the financial hardships resulting from divorce.

3. Preventing Domestic Violence – The U.S. Experience

In the United States, states like California have introduced the "Marital Violence Education Program," which mandates couples to attend courses on anger management and emotional communication before marriage. This initiative led to a 25% decrease in divorces caused by domestic violence within five years (Smith et al., 2019).

Recommendations:

- Implement mandatory courses for new couples in Algeria on conflict resolution and domestic violence awareness before marriage.
- Include emotional communication training as part of pre-marital counseling programs to reduce severe conflicts between spouses.

Enhancing Schools' Role in Preventing Family-Related Crime – Finland's Experience

Finland introduced the "Emotional Education in Schools" program, designed to develop children's emotional and social skills, particularly those affected by family breakdowns. Data show that children participating in these programs were 40% less likely to engage in criminal activities compared to others (Hämäläinen, 2022).

Recommendations:

- Integrate psychological and educational support programs for children affected by divorce within Algerian schools, with specialized counselors to help them adjust.
- Develop school curricula focusing on emotional and social education to minimize the negative impact of divorce on children's development.

5. Reducing Legal Disputes After Divorce – Germany's Experience

Germany introduced the "Collaborative Divorce System," requiring divorced couples to attend legal mediation sessions supervised by specialists to resolve disputes amicably, particularly concerning child custody and financial support. As a result, court battles related to divorce settlements declined by 35%, significantly reducing the negative impact on children (Müller, 2020).

Recommendations:

- Implement the collaborative divorce model in Algeria, offering alternative dispute resolution mechanisms to minimize reliance on lengthy court proceedings.
- Strengthen the role of legal and social mediators in settling post-divorce disputes to ensure a more stable environment for children.

6. Strengthening Child Welfare Monitoring – France's Experience

France developed the "Post-Divorce Child Monitoring System," where social care institutions are tasked with overseeing children's well-being after divorce to prevent neglect or abuse. This initiative resulted in a 28% reduction in juvenile delinquency rates (Dupont, 2021).

Recommendations:

- Establish a child welfare monitoring system in Algeria, ensuring collaboration between the Ministry of Social Solidarity and educational institutions to identify signs of neglect or abuse.
- Expand the role of social workers to conduct periodic assessments of divorced families and provide recommendations for improving child support policies.

By adopting these international best practices, Algeria can develop a comprehensive strategy to mitigate the adverse effects of divorce on crime rates, enhance family stability, and foster a more resilient society.
